

According to reports by UK's Daily Telegraph, the super-fast airliners could be in regular service by 2020. Imagine flying from New York City to London in less than an hour and Los Angeles to Beijing in less than two hours.

Imagine this morning farewell message from the American traveler's spouse: Hey, when you get to Beijing, would you bring home some take-out bird's nest soup, Peking duck and dim sum for dinner? And when you're in London tomorrow, be sure to visit a pub and order some toad in the hole, spotted dick and bubble and squeak for tomorrow's lunch back home.
