

That could mean traveling from NYC to Los Angeles in less than 90 minutes. And if they'll be able to run across water, NYC to London in the same quick time. Of course, it's all still in the spec stage for such trackless super trains in the far future.

However, UK's The Sun reports that engineers at the China Aerospace Science and Tech Corp claim they've already started on the plans. Of course, none of the tech beancounters have come up with a simple way to eliminate the two-hour drive through heavy city traffic to get to the train station, followed by another hour of checking in and pre-boarding security body cavity searches.